LIFE STORY READS JUST LIKE A NOVEL

(Chicago Record.)

The story of the life of the laird of Lathrisa, rifeshire, who died the other day, is as curious as could be found in any modern novel. His name was orge obnston, and although his rent roll was £14,000 ($70,000) a year, and he was besides reputed to be enormously wealthy, he lived the life of a recluse and was hardly ever known to cross the door of his mansion house for the last thirty years. There was a bit of romance associated with both his father and grand-father, the latter of whom is said to have haid the foundation of the family fortune by methods which brought him into conflict with the excise officers of the country. The father, who was also eccentric, married, when well advanced in years, a young girl, the daughter of one of his cotters. It was the story over again of "Auld Robin Gray," but after the wedding the all-assorted pair did not agree, and there were lively times at Lathrisk. Of that union three sons were born, one of whom was the laird of Lathrisk, who has just died. When quite a young man he had a violent quarrel with his father and atterward on the continent of Europe until his father's death. (Chicago Record.)

On his return to Lathrisk as laird he from that time on behaved in the most extraordinary manner. He shut himself up in his mansion and lived practically the life of a hermit. He seems to have Des Moines, Ia., Feb. 12.—Major E. II.

It is said that Johnston got over the difficulty of seeing a tailor, in order to purchase clothes, by getting the commissioner to send a farmer who closely resembled him in figure to get measured for him, and the stories that are current in the district about the miser's meanness would fill a goodly clumn. He died at the age of 78, and so far no will has been found. It was, of course, out of the question for him to pay a lawyer to make as will, but it was expected that at least a holographic document, which in Scotland constitutes a legal will, would be discovered. It is esti-
